-Everybody in Memphia remembers Mrs. Oates, the burlesque and comic actress. Well, she has parted from her husband. The Chicago Tribunc tells the story. They have lived so harmoniously together that the separation, when it became known, was regarded as a mere temporary affair—a sort of amantium ira—to be speedily followed by a renewing of mutual endearments. But the matter was more serious. Mrs. Oates left her husband, and their joint capital, which had al-ways been banked in his name, was drawn by her and deposited in hers, and Tracy Titus was left to shift for and Tracy Titus was left to shift for himself. The company, knowing upon which side of their bread the but-ter was worst to be spread, obeyed orders, and are still playing with Mrs. Oates. Titus is said to have set to work to reorganize a company of his own, but so far without success. What own, but so far without success. The evidence given by the different witnesses was very conflicting, a part indicating that Johnnie shot the deceased in a sudden heat of passion, and mined to award a handsome dictionary and silver cup to the young lady who shall prove victorious at his spellingmatch to be held the latter part of this age, that it was an accident, and that its fatal consequences and the narrow escape he has made from a felon's doom will be a warning to him and teach him to be more eareful in the future. The deceased was a young man of excellent character, quiet and unobtrusive in his disposition, and highly esteemed by all who knew him. He leaves a widowed mother to mourn his loss, and what that loss is, none but a mother can know.

The Theater.

Real Estate Drawing, until May 13,
There was another good house at the 1875. Tickets reduced to $1 each. No Theater last night to enjoy Mr. Owens in The Victims and Forty Winks. Both plays were well presented, and we would like the state of th like to speak at some length upon the roads. 17 houses, 2325 gold coin prizes, excellent impersonations of Mr. Owens and the good support by the stock company, but devote our space to mention of Self, which, with Live Indian, will be presented to-night. In Self Mr. Owens takes the role of "John Unit," a character which cannot fail to interest and win the admiration of all who see and man whose soul was wrapped up in one ides, that of making money. This was the end and aim of his existence. For WHO IS TO this only he lived and breathed. scarcely took time to sleep and eat. His meals were brought into his store, and He would listen patiently to speculative propositions, but if they did not promise to yield cent. per cent., his invariable chir answer was: "It won't pay, sir, won't hen's. pay!" This phrase became a by-word in the city. Mrs. Sidney F. Bateman having made a study of this eccentric character, conceived the idea of presenting him on the stage as the central figure of a purely American comedy. She wrote the comedy of Self, and the Na-tional theater of Cincinnati was crowded to see what could be made of old "John Bates." Although the manners and the sayings of the original old man were the resemblance stopped short at this point. The one was a miser, the other a kindly, warmhearted, eccentric old bachelor, with a crusty manner, keen, sharp, full of worldly wisdom, but the very soul of integrity. The creation of the authoress was a most enjoyable old man, and the audience were not at all surprised to hear "Mr. Bates," who was present in the dress circle on the opening night, exclaim, as he rose up in his seat, bit like me, sir, not a bit." As this exclamation was brought out at the moment "John Unit" was giving away a part of his money, the audience enjoyed the joke and admitted the force of the criticism. The community at large, however, are much indebted to the old miser of Cineinnati for having suggested the antithesis of the character, for without him the dramatic "John Unit" would have never existed. Mr. Owens, in giving us this new and original picture, has again testified to the extraordinary versatility of his genius. The "John Unit" does not in the least resemble any other old man in the actor's repertoire, nor does he in the faintest degree presume to resemble the man John E. Owens. Take some of the old men that Mr. Owens produces with such wonderful artistic power, "Solon Shin-gle," "Spruggins," "Caleb Plummer," there the slightest family relation. There is nothing that could lead the most careful observer to detect an affinity between creations so totally dissimilar. This is one of the strongest evidences of great genius. How thoughful, how minutely observant of details, how comprehensive in its grasp must be the genius which, for continuous hours, can rived. Charles S. Church, New Orleans; Andes, Wheeling; Kitty Hegler, Arkansas river, Departed; Andy Baum, Memphis. genius which, for continuous hours, can sustain this illusion of the stage and Probabilities. never for one moment drop the The comedy itself is well conceived, and | the South Atlantic and Gulf States and the characters, in the most part, are Tennessee, ccoler and partly cloudy purely American; not the less so that weather, with northerly to westerly the females in dress, manners and conversation endeavor to forget the land of their birth and worship that far-off paradise of their countrymea-Paris. The efforts made by the fashionable "Mrs. Apex," and the elegant "Mrs. Radius" to forget their humble origin, are rendered abortive through the bluntness of that terrible old man "Unit." who knew that the mother of one kept a "small cheap boarding house," and the grand-father of the other was "a worthy old wood-sawyer." The sterling qualities of old "Unit," however, appear when he comes to the rescue of his former partner, ruined through the extravagance of his wife, and the prodigality of their son. It is here that the old retired merchant stands with the firmness and steadiness of a rock among the wavering elements that surround him—the one man of principle among the weak and vacillating creatures of impulse. In this situa-tion the simple force of honesty and inthat were ever shed over the maudin sentiment and heart-breaking poetry of the modern French drama. It is a play with a healthy, sound moral, and is a simple nousehold story most pleasantly told. "John Unit" is not the least of Mr. Owens's triumphs, and in its indi-viduality is perhaps his most perfect cre-cers and Cotton Factors. viduality is perhaps his most perfect creintimate friends yesterday at a farewell breakfast, as he leaves for Europe in a house to-night.
